The US dollar increasingly lacks support

Key themes for the US dollar and global FX markets.

Last month we highlighted that US dollar gains in the lead-up to March Market Outlook had been narrow and capped around 100 for the DXY index. Since then, despite a material escalation in the Middle East conflict, the ceasefire being threatened by a complete breakdown of the first round of in-person negotiations between the US and Iran, and the US subsequently blockading Iranian ports, the US dollar has continued to struggle for upward momentum. On rumours of a resumption of negotiations, the past few days have seen it edge lower against numerous currencies across developed and developing markets.

In our view, there is a degree of hope in current market pricing. That said, typically the market impact of a crisis such as this begins to unwind long before a formal peace agreement is disclosed. And, in this particular instance, the short-term workarounds for supply and the intent shown by world leaders excluding the US to restore shipping capacity are also helping alleviate anxiety.

While certainly not a panacea for the conflict’s ill effects, if we are right in expecting a slow-but-steady resumption of shipping through the Strait of Hormuz in coming weeks, which continues to year end, then the US dollar is likely to weaken further, to the benefit of currencies most affected by the crisis – Euro and Sterling being developed world examples – and of nations set to benefit from improving global growth opportunities – China being the obvious example, particularly given their market share for equipment related to renewable energy and the green transition more broadly.

Our base case to June 2028 is largely unchanged from last month for the US dollar, the DXY index projected to fall from 98.1 today to 96.8 at end-2026, then 94.0 come end-2027, where it is forecast to settle. Gains for Euro and Sterling are key contributors, respectively rising from USD1.18 and USD1.35 at present up to USD1.22 and USD1.41 by end-2027.

Starting from such weak levels, the anticipated gains for Japan’s Yen and Canada’s dollar are also powerful supports for the US dollar downtrend. We expect USD/JPY to fall from JPY159 currently to JPY142 by mid-2028, as USD/CAD declines from CAD1.36 to CAD1.30.

If second-round inflation risks can be managed effectively without a material hit to economic growth or the labour market, further out, these currencies could experience sustained opportunities to outperform our base expectation.

It is not just core developed world currencies that are set to benefit from this turn, however. China’s Renminbi has been remarkably resilient during the crisis, only edging up from around CNY6.85 at end-February to a high of CNY6.91 during March, then steadily moving lower to CNY6.82. This makes sense given China’s strategic energy reserves and access to Russian and Iranian oil, among other relationships. But, once the scale and depth of China’s manufacturing base across green technologies is taken into consideration, and the acute need for these goods recognised by the world ex-US, this appreciation seems likely to only be the start. To mid-2028, we therefore look for USD/CNY to fall to CNY6.35, and suspect the risks are skewed in one direction – in the Renminbi’s favour.

While China’s Renminbi is likely to outperform many other US dollar bilaterals over the period, seeing a rise in the currency on a trade-weighted basis, this appreciation is unlikely to upset the nation’s competitive advantage. The rest of Asia in particular are likely to use the technology and know-how imported from China to improve their own capacity and lower production costs, aiding their economic performance and attractiveness to foreign capital. Each of the currencies of the region have their own starting points – Singapore’s dollar is strong, Indonesia’s Rupiah weak as examples – and domestic narratives to play out. But, over the course of two years, all are likely to gain against the US dollar and, to a lesser extent, other cornerstone currencies of the global system, such as Euro and Sterling.

While the uncertainty created by the Middle East conflict leaves us unsure as to when, we increasingly believe that historic safe-havens could find themselves under growing pressure over the forecast period as investors and businesses recognise the scale and breadth of developing market opportunities. These are broad across both manufacturing and service industries – along with core and technological infrastructure – and have very long runways ahead.

For the US dollar in particular, we see a heightened susceptibility, with this global outturn to follow an extended period of US' outperformance and as US geopolitical and fiscal decision making is debated at length across the globe.

Our current baseline forecast takes the US dollar DXY index near its 20-year average of 90.6, and so we will wait to see how developments break over coming weeks before considering the scale of further downward pressure the US dollar may face. For now we merely highlight that the average of the past 20 years muddies two eras, early-2015 to now when the DXY oscillated around today's level, and mid-2006 to mid-2014 when it instead averaged 80.2, 18% below spot. Coming years may well see a very different FX environment to that experienced post-pandemic.

This analysis was initially released in the April edition of Westpac Market Outlook.
