April's update on selected consumer prices was softer than expected. However, we're still on course for a sharp pick-up in inflation mid-year.

April's update on consumer prices was a bit softer than we expected. Much of that surprise was centred on volatile categories, like food and fuel. While that does suggest some downside risk to our forecast for 4.4% inflation in the June quarter, the full impact of oil price rises through the supply chain is yet to be felt, and a sharp rise in inflation is still on the cards for the middle part of the year.

Looking into the details of the April update:

- April saw a slightly larger than expected fall in the prices of fresh produce (down 2.3% over the month), as well as a fall in the price of instant coffee (down 0.6%). Prices for meat, groceries and takeaways were all up, but a little less than expected. While food price inflation has been a bit more moderate than anticipated, the risks are firmly to the upside. High prices for fuel and fertilizer will push production costs higher over the coming year. But due to growing cycles and the time needed for transport, their impact will be much more evident on supermarket shelves later this year.
- Fuel prices were up again with petrol prices up 13% (slightly below our forecast for a 15% rise) and diesel prices up 37%.
- Consistent with the rise in fuel prices, domestic airfares were up 4% with international airfares up 6%
- On the housing front, rents were again flat for a second month.
- Chocolate prices were up 11%, coinciding with Easter.

Outlook – how soon is now?

For the RBNZ, this month's data is likely to be cold comfort. Prices were a bit better contained than we expected this month, and that gives them a little more head room going into their next policy meeting on 27 May.

Even so, the sharp rise in fuel prices since February means inflation is still on course to rise well above 4% through the middle part of this year. Importantly, it will take time for the impact of higher fuel prices to be reflected in other consumer prices and for the related dampening impact economic activity to be seen clearly. That leaves the RBNZ walking a tight rope – interest rates will need to rise, but the question is how soon and how quickly? As we discuss in our latest  Economic Overview, we expect a series of rate hikes from September.
