Singapore is exposed to the current global energy shock due to its high import dependency, although risks are partly mitigated by diversified supply. It relies heavily on natural gas for electricity generation, accounting for >90% of the energy mix, with costs tied to oil prices by commercial contracts. Singapore's liquified natural gas (LNG) import mix is well distributed. Although Qatar accounted for ~25% share in volume terms as of 2024 (with some news sources citing >40% share in 2025), other key supply sources included Australia, Mozambique, and the US. Pipeline natural gas supplies from Indonesia and Malaysia, which together accounted for 43% of overall natural gas imports in 2025, provide an additional buffer. Singapore's direct goods exports exposure to the Middle East is limited, accounting for ~1.5% of the total in 2025. This suggests that a demand shock in the Middle East is unlikely to place significant downside pressure on exports.

Macroeconomic and policy implications

The global energy price shock in an event of a protracted Middle East conflict would likely raise Singapore's inflation more than it would depress economic growth, in our view. If Brent crude oil price remains at around USD100/bbl for the rest of the year, we estimate that Singapore's headline inflation could rise by around 1.5 percentage points (pp), while real GDP growth could be lowered by 0.4 pp (see 'Macro Insights Weekly: Asia's vulnerability to the Iran crisis' for additional analysis for other Asian economies). Singapore has ample policy space to tackle the external shock from Middle East geopolitical uncertainty.

Nearly all thermal fuel inputs are imported. Net fuel imports accounted for around 4% of nominal GDP in 2025, among the highest ratios in Asia, leaving the economy sensitive to sustained increases in global energy prices and shipping costs.

Taiwan sources roughly 70% of its crude oil from the Middle East—particularly Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and the UAE—and about 30% of its LNG from Qatar. A prolonged disruption in Hormuz would tighten supply and raise costs, although strategic reserves and diversified suppliers reduce the risk of severe shortages.

Higher input costs would raise electricity tariffs and production costs, particularly for energy-intensive sectors such as petrochemicals, steel, and semiconductor fabrication. Households would face higher energy bills, although government subsidies and ongoing wage growth should help cushion the impact.

Trade exposure

Taiwan's direct export exposure to the Middle East is minimal, accounting for less than 1% of total exports in 2025. Europe accounts for around 6%, suggesting that shipping disruptions in the Red Sea or Suez Canal would have only a limited first-round impact on trade volumes.

The larger risk comes from second-order effects of higher global energy costs. Elevated oil prices act as a tax on consumption, reducing household purchasing power in key markets such as the US and Europe. This could dampen demand for consumer electronics, PCs, and smartphones. However, structural technology trends continue to support Taiwan's exports. AI-related investment, data centers, and industrial policy-driven growth provide a cushion, helping offset a slowdown in traditional electronics exports.

Financial markets remain another channel of adjustment. Taiwan's equity valuations are high, with total market capitalization of the TWSE exceeding 300% of nominal GDP. Heightened geopolitical risks may prompt global investors to reduce exposure to high-beta markets. Still, strong corporate earnings and technology sector growth provide resilience, helping the market absorb shocks without destabilizing the broader economy.
